The Rise of China

- Political stability: China has enjoyed a period of relative political stability under the leadership of President Xi Jinping. This stability has allowed China to focus on economic development and military modernization.
- Demographic advantage: China's large population gives it a significant demographic advantage over the United States and other developed countries. This advantage is reflected in China's growing military and economic power.

- Spread its political ideology: China is promoting its own political ideology, known as "socialism with Chinese characteristics," around the world. It is seeking to undermine democracy and human rights, and it is supporting authoritarian regimes around the world.

Chang argues that the United States must take immediate action to counter China's growing power. He warns that if the United States does not take action, China will soon become the dominant global superpower, and the United States will be relegated to a secondary status.

- Promote democracy and human rights: The United States must promote democracy and human rights around the world. This will help to undermine China's political ideology and to support the forces of freedom and democracy around the world.
- Support Taiwan: The United States must continue to support Taiwan, a self-governing island that China claims as its own. Taiwan is a key strategic ally of the United States, and its independence is essential to maintaining stability in the Asia-Pacific region.
