

Cuban Americans and the Miami Media: A Tapestry of Influence and Identity

The Dawn of a New Era: Cuban Americans Forge a Media Presence

As waves of Cuban exiles sought refuge in Miami during the 1960s and 1970s, they brought with them a deep-rooted passion for journalism and communication. Determined to connect with their community and share their perspectives, they established a plethora of Spanish-language newspapers, radio stations, and television programs.

Among the most influential early ventures was El Nuevo Herald, a Spanish-language daily newspaper founded in 1977. Led by the visionary Jose Ferraro, El Nuevo Herald quickly became a trusted source of news and information for Miami's growing Cuban-American community.
