As the war raged across Europe, soldiers from New Zealand found solace in familiar tunes and poignant new songs composed by fellow soldiers. "Maori Battalion Farewell" and "The Kiwi Lament" became anthems of both pride and heartache, echoing the longing for home and the sacrifices made on foreign soil.

On the home front, music served as a lifeline for those left behind. Composers such as Alfred Hill and David Farquhar penned moving laments and patriotic anthems that kindled hope and expressed the collective pain and determination of the nation. The lyrics of these songs, filled with stirring imagery and heartfelt emotion, provide an invaluable glimpse into the human experience of war.

The Songs and Sounds of New Zealand's Great War goes beyond the familiar wartime melodies. It explores the role of music in recruitment campaigns, army training, and the entertainment of troops. It uncovers the stories of gifted musicians who served in the war, including the remarkable tale of Daisy Jean Klein, a talented soprano who performed for soldiers in Egypt and France.

The book also examines the impact of Maori culture on New Zealand's wartime music. Traditional Maori songs and chants infused military marching tunes and concert performances, adding a unique and vibrant dimension to the musical landscape of the Great War.

Beautifully illustrated with archival photographs and period documents, The Songs and Sounds of New Zealand's Great War captures the essence of a nation grappling with the profound challenges and emotions of war. It is a testament to the transformative power of music, a reminder of the human spirit's ability to find solace, strength, and connection even in the darkest of times.
