The Founders were influenced by the writings of Montesquieu, who argued that the separation of powers was essential to prevent tyranny. They believed that the chief executive should be a separate and equal branch of government, with its own powers and responsibilities. They also believed that the president should be subject to checks and balances from the other branches of government.

The Founders' vision for chief executive has been realized in the modern-day presidency. The president is a powerful and influential figure, but he or she is also subject to checks and balances from the other branches of government.
