Embark on a vibrant journey through the streets of London in the 1970s, as we explore the iconic buses that defined an era. From the classic red double-deckers to the eye-catching green Routemasters, each bus tells a unique story about the city and its people.

A Kaleidoscope of Colours

The 1970s marked a time of transformation for London's buses. As the city embraced new modes of transportation, the traditional red buses began to share the roads with a diverse array of colours.

- Red: The iconic colour of London buses, representing the double-deckers that have become synonymous with the city.
- Green: The signature colour of the Routemaster buses, which were introduced in the 1950s and became an instant favourite with Londoners.

- Blue: The colour of the iconic AEC Reliance buses, which were introduced in the 1960s and were known for their reliability and comfort.
- Orange: The colour of the Leyland Atlantean buses, which were introduced in the 1970s and were known for their distinctive shape and large windows.
- Yellow: The colour of the Leyland National buses, which were introduced in the late 1970s and were known for their modern design.

A Changing Landscape

The 1970s also saw a significant shift in London's transportation landscape. The of new bus routes and the expansion of the underground system transformed the way people travelled around the city.

As London grew and evolved, so did its buses. The of new technologies and the changing needs of the population led to the gradual phasing out of older buses and the of new, more efficient models.

Preserving the Legacy

Today, the iconic buses of the 1970s are a cherished reminder of a bygone era. Preserved examples can be found in museums and private collections, while enthusiasts and historians continue to celebrate their legacy.

This book, "The Colours of London Buses in the 1970s," is a testament to the enduring power of these iconic vehicles. Through stunning photography and insightful commentary, it captures the vibrant world of London buses, transporting readers back in time to an era of colour and change.
